

The Correct Way to Write an Essay Body?

The body of the essay is the main section where all the important information and main points go. Therefore, it needs careful planning and must be written using the correct format. The body introduces the main ideas, your opinion on the topic, evidence and examples to back them up.

A typical essay comprises three body paragraphs and here's how you must write them:

Each body paragraph follows the same structure that is shown below:

Paragraph 1

- Topic sentence
- Supporting idea

- Evidence
- Explanation
- Summary sentence (optional)

The topic sentence is the opening sentence of your paragraph that sums up the main point being discussed. It helps provide the reader with an overview of the paragraph and grab the reader's attention. When writing a topic sentence avoid phrases such as "In this paragraph I will discuss ...", "This paragraph talks about...", etc."

Next, present your opinions and discuss the main points of your essay. Make sure that each paragraph discusses a single main idea. To support your ideas share supporting evidence and examples that you have gathered from authentic sources.

Don't stop here; explain the connectivity of the evidence to the point that you have made. Also, show your reader the bigger picture of how this evidence justifies your overall thesis statement.

You can end the body paragraph with a brief summary; however, this isn't compulsory.

Remember that all of these paragraphs should work together to prove the thesis statement. So, use smooth transitions to move from one paragraph to the other.

If you are stuck or are unable to convey your ideas effectively, there's no need to panic. Look for essay writing help online – don't worry about the cost. Team up with an essay writer free and have them help you craft an engaging piece of content.
